

My After-School Reset Plan

Original worksheet by Sophia Cohon, PhD

Home is where I get to land. Choose what helps before adding the next demand.

Pick what helps first

☐ Drink	☐ Snack	☐ Bathroom
☐ Quiet	☐ Movement	☐ Comfortable clothes
☐ Familiar media	☐ Someone nearby	☐ Time alone

Pause these for now

☐ School questions	☐ Homework	☐ Chores
☐ Problems	☐ Tomorrow

I can show what I need

☐ Talk	☐ Point	☐ Write / type
☐ Show this page	☐ Use a signal	☐ Be quiet

My running-out-of-room signs

Body 	Words
Senses 	Actions

My reset choices

A support I choose 	Another choice 	A backup choice
---	---	--

For adults: offer choices without making this a quiz. Plan during a calm time. The child can tell or show when they have more room; address immediate safety needs calmly.

Plan the landing before school ends

For a clinician or support person

Notice patterns across school, travel, and home. A reset is support, not something a child must earn.

- Offer time, space, and a manageable way to communicate after overload.
- Ask which choices help. Keep touch, noise, and talking within what the child can manage.
- Share useful observations with school or a clinician when needed. This plan does not explain every cause of distress.

Choose one next step

What used up room at school or on the way home?

What adults agree to pause

How I show I am ready

One manageable next step we agree on

What should we watch next?

What helped the landing or recovery?

What should we change or watch next?

About this worksheet

Original planning tool; not a validated assessment or a reproduced outside worksheet. The sources support the general guidance, not validation of this tool. Guidance checked October 3, 2026.

National Autistic Society: responding to overload

National Autistic Society: sensory processing and support

After School Is a Landing, Not a Launch | short guide